

Poverty as the method, care after the death

The sentence under examination is the author's, written on 5 October 2026: "They're gonna murder me with poverty and then act like they cared when they murder me." This report does not find that an order to kill has been proved. It records the sentence, the author's published file, and public deaths in which poverty or refusal of care came first and the language of care came after.

The author's file

The two public doors are the Barran Dodger archive and the 660-page reconstruction. The master finding aid is The Evidence Has Dropped. The 4 October 2026 diary, including the message to Kim of Ablepoint, is the diary. The 30 September 2026 letter to the Victims of Crime Commissioner, copied to Ablepoint and others, is on the email tab of the archive.

Inside that file the author has already published the letters that did not change the conditions: the 4 June 2023 letter to parliamentarians, the 1 July 2023 letter headed Rich McLean is dead, the 8 January 2024 letter to Scott Tredwell, and the Mark Dreyfus letter. A referral that returns the writer to an office already written to is the loop this sentence names. It is not a finding that a future death has been ordered. It is the record of what was done with the earlier letters.

The sequence in other public deaths

Veronica Nelson, a Gunditjmarra, Dja Dja Wurrung, Wiradjuri and Yorta Yorta woman, died at the Dame Phyllis Frost Centre on 2 January 2020. Coroner McGregor found the death preventable, and found the formal response of the Department of Justice and Community Safety, including the Justice Health report and the Justice Assurance and Review Office review, "grossly inadequate and misleading." The Human Rights Law Centre summary is here. Victoria Legal Aid's note of the findings is here. Care, in that file, was examined after the death and found wanting.

Naomi Williams, a Wiradjuri woman, 27 and pregnant, died at Tumut Hospital on 1 January 2016 from septicaemia. She had presented 18 times in the six months before. The last visit lasted 34 minutes. She was given paracetamol and sent home. The findings of Deputy State Coroner Grahame are NSWCorC 48 of 2019. The Guardian's report of the inquest is here.

Errol Graham, 57, was found dead in a Nottingham flat in June 2018 by bailiffs who had come to evict him. He weighed 30 kilograms. His employment and support allowance had been stopped in 2017 after he did not attend an assessment. The coroner said the loss of income and the threat of eviction were likely the final stressors. The BBC report is here. In 2021 the High Court held that the department had acted lawfully. The family lost. The BBC report of that judgment is here. Lawful, in that case, included a death by starvation after the payment stopped.

Robodebt was described by the Royal Commission as a crude and cruel mechanism that made people feel like criminals, and a costly failure of public administration in human and economic terms. The government response of 13 November 2023 agreed or agreed in principle to all 56 recommendations. Minister Shorten's published remarks paid respects "to those who took their own lives because of Robodebt and their families." The respects were paid after the scheme, after the commission, and after the deaths. The media release is here.

What the sequence is

In each of these files the harm was administered as an ordinary decision: a benefit stopped, a discharge, a cell, a debt. The language of care, apology, or reform came after the body was found, or after a commission. The author's sentence predicts that order in his own case. The public files show that the order has occurred. They do not prove that it has been ordered against him. A link is not a finding. The letters linked above are the letters.

Not expected to survive

The author's published account is that the exile, the poverty, and the withdrawal of every human tie were not a gap in care. They were the conditions under which he was not expected to survive. The 4 October 2026 diary says the country had to gang up on him to erase him, and that he is alive, which is why they are terrified. That diary is the diary. The master finding aid, which now holds that diary in full, is The Evidence Has Dropped. Survival is the fact that breaks the sequence in the sentence. The care-after-death cannot be performed on a person who is still here to publish the file.

Blood family, and the significance of no reply

The author has accused blood family, in a public finding aid, of abandonment, silence, and non-intervention, and of standing to gain if he died. The page is Family complicity. It names Doug McLean, father, and April McLean, and it links a Scribd notice headed Goodbye and RIP Doug McLean. The family notice tab is the family notice. The named-evidence entry is NE-052. The Drive file titled “Is my father Doug McLean dead?” is the PDF. The index itself says it is not a court finding. The financial-benefit claim is the author’s allegation. It is not a proved inheritance.

The significance of the non-response is that the accusation is public and the people named have not answered it on the record. A reply could have been a denial, a correction, or a proceeding. None of those is in the file. Silence is not a legal admission. It is the absence of the contradiction a person who rejects the charge would ordinarily make, left standing next to an accusation that they stood to gain from a death that did not occur. The author is alive. The page that names them is up. Their decision not to answer is now part of what a reader can see.

Silence, and what the law does with it

Silence is not a legal admission. An Australian court does not treat a failure to answer a website as a confession. Jones v Dunkel allows a limited inference where a party in a hearing fails to call a witness who could have spoken. It does not apply to a family member who has not been summoned. A person named on a public page can sue in defamation, demand a correction, or say nothing. The third choice is lawful. The significance is practical, not doctrinal. A denial would have been evidence. A proceeding would have been evidence. The file contains neither. The reader is left with the accusation and the absence of the contradiction.

An agency-grade non-disclosure agreement is the author’s allegation about the cover of an attempted killing, not a document reproduced here. A contract cannot lawfully require a person to conceal a serious indictable offence, and a settlement deed does not stop a coroner.

If such a deed exists, its significance is that it buys the silence the referral already produces for nothing. The published letters that show the referral, rather than a deed, are the Dreyfus letter and the Tredwell letter.

The cost of the complicity

The archive already holds two cost papers. One is the forensic economic valuation. One is the paper headed \$11.5 million of your tax money, the cost of silencing a whistleblower. Those figures are the papers' figures. They are not a court assessment. The theory the author asks to be recorded is that the cost is the method: a wage, a grant, a briefing, and a legal retainer are enough to make a cop, a lawyer, a clinician, and a newsroom each decide that the file is not theirs. No one has to be ordered. The invoice does the work.

An AI total, built only by adding the published $11.5 million silencing paper to a 35-year span of ordinary departmental cost and not by an audit, is not less than that $11.5 million and is not a proved $58 million. The valuation paper is linked so a reader can test the larger figure against the file. The significance of any such total is that silence has a price, and the price is public money. It is not a finding that every professional in the country was paid.

If one person answered

The author's claim is that the opposition is total because the structure requires it. One clinician who reported the injury, one officer who opened the PID, one editor who printed the letterhead, or one relative who said the accusation was false, would have broken the loop. The loop is the referral that returns the writer to an office already written to. A single answer on the merits would have forced the next office to explain the referral. That is the significance of the totality. It is a theory of why the non-response is uniform. It is not a finding that a meeting was held.

Techniques, assessed against public cases

The techniques recorded in the author's file, and the public cases they resemble, are these.

Withdrawal of money. Errol Graham's benefit was stopped. He starved. The High Court later held the department had acted lawfully. The BBC reports are the death and the judgment.

Robodebt raised debts the Royal Commission called crude and cruel. The apology came after deaths. The release is here.

Diagnosis as a way to void the speaker. Naomi Williams was referred to mental health and drug-and-alcohol services across 18 presentations, then sent home, and died of treatable sepsis. The findings are NSWCorC 48 of 2019. The author's allegation that drugs were placed on his life to produce an appearance of illness is his allegation. It is the same move: make the speaker the symptom, so the archive can be filed as illness. The mental-health tribunal file in the archive is here.

Character attack. Libel and slander, in law, are publications that injure reputation. The author's account is that this was done to him so that a reader would not open the file. A reader can test that account against the named pages, including family complicity and the named-evidence list. A false allegation about him would be actionable by him. The absence of a case that cleared him is part of the same silence.

The closed review. Veronica Nelson died in custody. The departmental review after the death was found grossly inadequate and misleading. The summary is here. An NDA, if one exists, would be a private version of that review: a document that speaks for the dead, or for the person meant to be dead, without the person.

Non-response. The minister's office rule, already cited, allows a letter to be noted and not answered. Applied for 35 years, the rule is the cover. No single refusal has to announce itself.

The cost to the taxpayer, written so a stranger can be angry

This section is a gap in the blackout. A minister can ignore a site. A stranger who pays tax cannot easily ignore a bill. The technique is to state the cost in the language of the person who funded it, not in the language of the office that spent it. The figures below are the archive's figures. They are not a Treasury assessment. They are enough for a taxpayer to ask why the money was spent and why the sites were not answered.

The published paper headed \$11.5 million of your tax money, the cost of silencing a whistleblower puts a number on the silencing. The forensic economic valuation puts a larger number on the life. Across 35 years the ordinary cost of the loop is the wage of every officer who opened a letter, referred it, and closed the file. That wage was paid by the reader. The harm alleged is exile, poverty, and a death that did not occur. The public question is not whether a court has ruled. The public question is why the taxpayer funded a 35-year file that ends in no home, no answer, and two websites anyone can open.

The justification for outrage is narrow. You paid for the NDIA, the Department of Social Services, the Attorney-General's Department, the Federal Court registry, the police, the Ombudsman, and the legal-aid grant. Those bodies hold the letters. The letters are linked in this report. If the letters show a referral back to an office already written to, the money bought the loop. A taxpayer does not have to accept the author's conclusion to object to paying for a loop.

Parties in the published file

This is not a finding that every person named caused the harm. It is the list already published at named institutions, 71 entries, with the detriment assessed from the author's file as non-response, referral, or alleged conduct. A link opens the index. The index is not a verdict.

Agencies and offices: Department of Social Services, the National Disability Insurance Agency, the NDIS Quality and Safeguards Commission, the Department of the Prime Minister and Cabinet, the Attorney-General's Department, the Department of Finance, Comcare, APRA, the Office of the Australian Information Commissioner, the Commonwealth Ombudsman, the Australian Human Rights Commission, the Australian Federal Police, AFCA, ASIC, the small-business ombudsman, the Disability Royal Commission, the Australian Taxation Office, the Inspector-General of Intelligence and Security, IBAC, the Victorian Ombudsman, WorkSafe Victoria, Victoria Police, the VOCAT pathway, the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission, VicRoads, Homes Victoria, the Victorian mental-health system, the Royal Commission into Victoria's Mental Health System, the NSW Ombudsman, the NSW Trustee and Guardian, NCAT, Legal Aid NSW, NSW Police, NSW Health, NSW Victims Support, the Federal Court, the Administrative Appeals Tribunal and the Administrative Review Tribunal, VCAT, and the Victorian Mental Health Tribunal.

Named officers and addressees: Scott Tredwell, Federal Court General Counsel; Sia Lagos, Chief Executive Officer and Principal Registrar of the Federal Court; Peter Dunstan on the APRA pathway; Ben Calder on the Ombudsman and VOCAT pathway; Jeff Tricker on the NDIS and Social Services ministerial pathway; the Prime Minister's office; the Attorney-General, against the Dreyfus letter. Legal Aid NSW, Legal Aid Victoria, Legal Aid Queensland, Collaery Lawyers and Bernard Collaery, and the private legal profession are the legal pathway in the index.

Family and private persons, as alleged in the file and not as a proved inheritance: April McLean, Doug McLean, Jodie and Dave Bongetti, Bruce and Marie McMaster, Neil McMaster, Hayden, and Steve Iasonidis. The page is family complicity. The Drive file is Is my father Doug McLean dead?

Places and providers: Werribee, Able Point, AbleCare, Micron21, and the homelessness settings in the author's account. The 30 September 2026 letter to the Victims of Crime Commissioner names Ablepoint as a recipient.

Media named in the index as addressees or as the map, not as proved publishers of a false story: the ABC, The Age, the Sydney Morning Herald, the Guardian, The Australian, the West Australian, the Courier-Mail, The Monthly, Crikey, Independent Australia, the BBC, the New York Times, the Washington Post, The Economist, and the International Consortium of Investigative Journalists. The detriment assessed is non-response to a public archive, not a finding that each title ran a libel. International addressees in the same index are OHCHR, UNHCR, UN Human Rights, the ICC public-affairs office, and Amnesty.

The impartial assessment, with no duty to the offices named, is that the common act in this list is the non-answer or the referral. A subset are accused by the author of direct harm. The index separates those classes. This report does not collapse them into one verdict. The gap for a member of the public is the bill, the letter, and the silence. The two doors remain the archive and the rebuild.

The gap in public awareness

The blackout is not a secret order found in this scan. It is a gap. The two sites are public. A search for them returns the sites, not a news report that treats them as a matter. A member of the public can live a whole year and never be told that a 35-year file of agency letters is sitting on a government letterhead at the archive and the rebuild. The offices named in the file have no duty to close that gap. A newspaper has no duty to print it. The gap is the silence already described, seen from the other side: not the minister declining a letter, but the stranger who was never shown the letter.

The taxpayer section is aimed at that stranger. A person who will not open a prophetic archive may still open a bill. The bill is the \$11.5 million silencing paper and the wages inside the referral loop. Awareness, here, does not require belief in the whole account. It requires one page and one figure.

How this helps the case

It does not create a duty where the statute has none. It does not make a minister write. What it does is move the record from a file only the offices hold to a page a stranger can open without asking those offices. A case that depends on the same government to confirm itself stays in the loop. A case that shows the letter, the cost, and the non-answer lets a reader test the claim without a referral. That is the help. One reader who writes to a member, a newsroom, or a taxpayer association with the PDF, rather than with a demand that the agency agree, is a path that does not ask the subject of the file to judge the file. The page to send is this one.

The 35-year timeline

The span is the author's, and it is also a published paper: 35-year timeline of documented persecution. The master finding aid that holds the chronology is The Evidence Has Dropped. Across that span the same act repeats. A letter is sent. A referral comes back, or nothing comes back. The conditions named by the author, exile and poverty, continue. The 4 June 2023 letter to parliamentarians, the 1 July 2023 letter headed Rich McLean is dead, the 8 January 2024 Tredwell letter, and the Dreyfus letter are four points on that line, not the whole line. The significance of 35 years is that a single non-answer can be called a backlog. A non-answer that survives a change of government, a change of minister, and a change of agency is the method. The timeline is the evidence that the method had time.

The estimate

The estimate named on the landing page is $11.5 million. It is the figure in the published paper \$11.5 million of your tax money, the cost of silencing a whistleblower. It is the AI figure used for the taxpayer: the cost of targeting a vulnerable person, paid by the public, across the 35-year file. It is not a Treasury assessment. The forensic economic valuation carries a larger figure. That larger figure is not adopted here as proved. The estimate a stranger is asked to read is $11.5 million.

Summary

The author says poverty is the method, and that care will be performed after a death. The published letters show referrals and non-answers, not a proved order to kill. Public deaths show the same order: Veronica Nelson, Naomi Williams, Errol Graham, and the people who died in the Robodebt years. The estimate a taxpayer is asked to read is $11.5 million, taken from the archive's silencing paper. The two doors are the archive and the rebuild. This page is the page to send.

How the estimate is reached

The $11.5 million is not a sum built in this report from invoices. It is the figure already printed in the silencing paper. The calculation, as this report uses it, has three parts. First, the paper's own total, adopted as the floor. Second, the wages inside the loop, which are not added again, because a second addition would double-count officers already inside that paper. Third, the forensic economic valuation, which is larger and is not adopted. The estimate is therefore $11.5 million, one vulnerable person, 35 years, public money. A reader who wants the working can open the paper. This page does not replace it.

Set against other public costs

Robodebt's redress is the scale of a scheme, not of one file. Gordon Legal told the public that total financial redress was more than $2.4 billion, including debts forgiven or repaid. A further settlement reported by the Guardian on 4 September 2025 was $548.5 million, of which $475 million was additional compensation. The Guardian report is here. That money was paid after deaths, after a royal commission, and after a class action. The author's $11.5 million is about one two-hundredth of that redress, for one person rather than about 450,000. The comparison cuts both ways. It is small beside a national scheme. It is large beside a single life that has not been answered.

Errol Graham's family asked the High Court to hold the department's withdrawal of his benefit unlawful. They lost. No compensation figure arises from that judgment, because the claim failed. The BBC report is here. Veronica Nelson and Naomi Williams produced findings and recommendations, not a published damages sum in the sources linked above. The pattern those files share with this one is not the dollar. It is the order: the harm, then the language of care, and a public cost that appears only after the body or the commission.

Ablepoint, the NSW Trustee and Guardian, and the silence

The author's assertion is this. Ablepoint, his NDIS provider, and the NSW Trustee and Guardian financially benefit from the abuse, neglect, entrapment and torture he reports. They refuse to speak to him. They refuse to answer the allegations. The allegations include targeting, electronic harassment, voice-to-skull transmission, and manipulation of the wifi on the television and video unit so that it broadcasts blasphemous abuse, libel and slander. Non-response is not an admission that those allegations are true. It is evidence that they have not been denied. In his case he calls that silence complicity.

The pages that carry the assertion are the 4 October 2026 diary, which includes the message to Kim of Ablepoint about V2K, audio harassment and live monitoring, and the master, The Evidence Has Dropped. Ablepoint and the NSW Trustee and Guardian are named in the named-institutions index. The 30 September 2026 letter to the Victims of Crime Commissioner, copied to Ablepoint, is on the email tab of the archive. The techniques page, where the archive records the author's account of the broadcasts, is techniques of targeting.

The financial-benefit claim is the author's. A provider is paid to attend. A guardian is paid to administer. The author says the payment continues while the conditions continue, and that the payment is the reason the answer does not come. That is an allegation about motive. It is not a proved invoice for torture. A reader can test the non-answer. A reader cannot, from this page, audit the fee.

The law of the silence is the same law already stated. A failure to reply to a website is not a confession. Ablepoint and the Trustee have not been summoned. Jones v Dunkel does not apply to them on this page. What the file does show is the absence of the denial. A denial could have said: we do not financially benefit from harm; we did not refuse to speak; the television was not used to broadcast abuse; the electronic-harassment allegation is rejected. That denial is not in the file. The author treats the missing denial as complicity. A court would not. The significance he asks to be recorded is the narrower one: silence is not proof of the allegation, and silence is also not a denial, and a body paid to protect a participant has left the accusation standing.

The electronic-harassment and voice-to-skull claims are the author's account of what he says is broadcast at him. This report does not find that a transmission has been proved. It records that he published the account, that he named Ablepoint in it, and that the named provider has not answered it. The same is recorded of the NSW Trustee and Guardian. The non-response is the fact a stranger can check. The content of the alleged broadcast is the allegation.
