

Personal Statement of Exile, Institutional Detriment and the Search for Protection

I am carrying what I understand to be the accumulated ethical failure and betrayal of institutions and professions across the country.

I carry the betrayal of former friends and blood family members. I carry the consequences of decisions, omissions, refusals, exclusions and institutional responses that, in my account, have progressively stripped away relationships, financial security, housing security, professional standing, legal access, autonomy and the ordinary protections that a citizen should be able to expect.

I am in political exile within the democracy of my own citizenship.

I describe myself as an unprotected whistleblower because I have repeatedly attempted to disclose matters of public interest and obtain protection, legal assistance, recognition and an accountable response. The archive I have assembled preserves correspondence, government records, public-interest disclosures, chronology, testimony, evidence pathways and institutional responses across these issues. Its central proposition is not that people should simply believe me, but that the underlying record should be examined.

I am not a criminal.

What I am describing is what I say has been occurring to me: a prolonged process of institutional, financial, social, professional and psychological detriment in which the mechanisms that should provide protection or redress have, in my experience, instead become mechanisms of containment.

The archive itself maps alleged mechanisms including administrative annihilation, exile, denial of legal aid, character assassination and institutional obstruction. It expressly describes these as an analytical model and allegation-and-evidence framework rather than established criminal findings.

Isolation and accommodation

I am isolated and entrapped in accommodation. I cannot escape in any meaningful practical sense.

I have no lease to Ablepoint.

My position is that Ablepoint, as an NDIS provider, has financially benefited from my treatment and containment while maintaining that I am free to leave. In practical terms, however, I say that I have no financial mechanism by which I can actually leave, no vehicle with which to escape, and nowhere viable to go.

The distinction between being technically free to leave and possessing the practical means to leave is central to my complaint.

The archive contains specific Ablepoint-related material, including May 2026 court material and a duty-officer statement, and identifies an NDIS institutional chain involving the NDIA, NDIS Quality & Safeguards Commission, providers, Ablepoint/Sahara and plan administration. Those materials require examination against the underlying documents rather than being treated as a determination of wrongdoing.

Surveillance, harassment and the experience of V2K

I say that I have been electronically intercepted, harassed and surveilled, including through what I describe as unacknowledged V2K technology.

I experience this as audio harassment occurring over extended periods, including what I describe as 24-hour blasphemous slurs directed at my sense of self, identity, dignity and faith.

I understand this as a deliberate technique of torture and psychological destruction.

That is my account of the experience. I am asking for the allegation to be investigated rather than automatically explained away, dismissed or converted into a medical diagnosis without examining the underlying circumstances.

The archive records complaints concerning surveillance and investigation scope, including material associated with the IGIS, and separately preserves the author's account of the alleged V2K experience. The archive's methodology expressly distinguishes testimony and allegation from independently established fact.

Mental-health treatment and compulsory medication

A mental-health CTO mandates my forced medication.

In my experience, this treatment has been presented as the panacea for my problems while the circumstances I am describing remain unacknowledged.

My objection is not simply to treatment itself. It is to what I say occurs when the entire surrounding situation is interpreted through a psychiatric framework while the possibility that some of the circumstances described by me may have an external, social, institutional, financial or interpersonal cause is not adequately examined.

I say that the result is a circular process: circumstances producing distress are treated as evidence of illness, while the circumstances themselves remain insufficiently investigated.

The archive contains a substantial health and mental-health evidence pathway, but also expressly states that its medical material and interpretations should be independently examined rather than treated as medical findings created by the archive itself.

Financial control and access to justice

I say that NSW Trustee & Guardian have become the gatekeepers to my financial survival and, in my experience, to my ability to pursue legal redress.

I describe my financial situation as a form of containment because without sufficient access to money I cannot freely relocate, obtain independent assistance, secure alternative accommodation, maintain transport or pursue complex legal processes.

I further allege that the practical effect has been a near-total legal-aid barrier, fundamentally obstructing possible pathways to justice.

The archive contains Legal Aid NSW correspondence concerning guardianship, NSW Trustee & Guardian material, NCAT pathways and related oversight material. It also preserves an August 2025 Commonwealth Ombudsman service-restriction document and other records concerning access to institutional remedies. The documents need to be examined individually to determine precisely what was refused, why it was refused and what review mechanisms existed.

My allegation is therefore not simply that I experienced poverty. It is that poverty, restricted financial autonomy and restricted access to legal assistance have operated together to create a condition in which the ability to challenge the circumstances becomes progressively harder.

My professional and public-interest history

This situation is particularly significant because I am not approaching these issues without a history of public communication.

I was formerly a journalist and news graphics artist and have worked publicly as a mental-health advocate. I have spoken through Australian and international television, radio and print media, and my life and art have been documented by the Dax Centre.

I therefore experience the subsequent disappearance of my voice from mainstream institutional and media channels as profoundly significant.

I allege that there has been an effective media blackout surrounding matters that I have attempted to disclose.

I have described the possibility of a black budget or other undisclosed funding mechanism being involved in sustaining such a blackout. I do not present that proposition as an established fact; it is an allegation and question arising from my interpretation of the pattern of events and requires independent evidence.

The proper question is therefore not whether a reader is willing to believe that such a mechanism exists. The proper question is whether there is documentary evidence capable of establishing or disproving it.

Character assassination, professional isolation and deterrence

I allege that where other mechanisms have failed, a coordinated campaign of libel, slander, character assassination, deliberate smearing and humiliation has operated to produce social, financial and professional detriment.

I further allege that this has had a deterrent effect upon people who might otherwise consider standing with me.

My concern is that the consequence is larger than damage to my reputation. If a person believes that associating with me could expose them to professional, financial or social consequences, then isolation becomes self-reinforcing.

The archive describes this as an alleged mechanism within its broader model of targeting: weaken, isolate, discredit, impoverish, exhaust, deprive of support, undermine credibility, obstruct redress, make institutionally invisible and ultimately erase. The site expressly labels this model as an author's analytical account rather than a court finding.

My dog Crystal

The treatment of my sick therapy dog, Crystal, is an especially painful part of my account.

I allege that veterinary emergencies involving Crystal have been denied or obstructed by Ablepoint and by the financial and guardianship circumstances involving NSW Trustee & Guardian and the Public Guardian.

I believe the consequences of this have deliberately maximised my distress.

To me, the significance goes beyond the treatment of an animal. Crystal is an innocent dependent being and a source of companionship and emotional stability. If access to necessary veterinary care is obstructed, the consequences extend directly into my own psychological and emotional wellbeing.

I allege that this forms part of a broader campaign of psychological pressure in which circumstances capable of causing extreme distress are created or allowed to continue and the resulting distress is subsequently used as evidence of mental illness.

The circularity of psychiatric interpretation

This is one of the central issues I want investigators to examine.

I say that I have been subjected to circumstances that would cause distress to an ordinary human being and then referred into the hospital and mental-health system, where the resulting distress can be interpreted as evidence of the illness rather than as a possible response to the circumstances themselves.

In my account, the process becomes self-reinforcing:

The circumstances cause distress.

The distress is interpreted as psychiatric evidence.

The psychiatric interpretation reduces the credibility of my account.

The reduction in credibility makes it easier for the underlying circumstances to remain unexamined.

The continuing circumstances then produce further distress.

And the resulting distress is again interpreted as evidence of illness.

I allege that this cycle has enabled the underlying issues to remain outside proper investigation.

The broader pattern I am asking people to examine

I do not claim that every institution, professional or individual appearing in my archive is guilty of wrongdoing.

The archive itself makes that distinction explicitly. It contains an institutional map of Commonwealth and state agencies, courts, tribunals, health providers, NDIS organisations, professional bodies, media organisations and international institutions, but states that appearance in the archive does not establish wrongdoing, conspiracy, participation or liability.

My allegation concerns the cumulative effect of the system.

Housing.

Money.

Transport.

Legal assistance.

Healthcare.

Compulsory treatment.

NDIS support.

Guardianship.

Professional reputation.

Family and friendships.

Media access.

Whistleblower protection.

Institutional recognition.

Access to justice.

Each individual event may be capable of being explained separately. My contention is that the cumulative pattern cannot properly be understood by examining every event in isolation.

The archive therefore uses the concept of cumulative institutional detriment as an analytical framework. It is not presented as a legal finding.

The allegation of a coordinated campaign

I allege that the cumulative pattern amounts to a coordinated campaign designed, whether intentionally or through institutional interaction, to isolate, discredit, impoverish, exhaust and ultimately erase me.

I allege that this campaign has operated through multiple mechanisms rather than a single institution.

I allege that when one pathway was closed, another mechanism took its place.

When financial independence was restricted, physical relocation became more difficult.

When legal assistance became inaccessible, institutional decisions became harder to challenge.

When I attempted to disclose matters publicly, I say my credibility became the focus.

When I described surveillance or harassment, I say those experiences were vulnerable to psychiatric interpretation.

When I experienced distress, that distress could then be used to reinforce the psychiatric interpretation.

When I attempted to obtain support, I say the institutional response itself sometimes became part of the problem.

This is the pattern I am asking independent investigators to test.

Why I call myself an internally displaced refugee

I describe myself as an internally displaced refugee within the democracy of my own citizenship.

I use that phrase to describe the experience of being unable, in practical terms, to secure safety, autonomy, housing, financial independence and effective protection within my own country.

I recognise that this is a political and legal characterisation rather than an automatically established legal status.

Under UNHCR's international framework, the legal concept of refugee generally concerns a person who is outside their country of nationality or habitual residence and who cannot or will not return because of a well-founded fear of persecution on specified grounds. UNHCR separately defines internally displaced persons as people who have been forced or obliged to leave their homes or habitual residence without crossing an internationally recognised border, although its statistical definition has particular scope relating to conflict-generated displacement.

Accordingly, my description of myself as an internally displaced refugee is best understood as my claim of forced internal displacement and lack of effective protection, rather than a statement that an international body has already formally recognised me as a refugee.

I have sought or contemplated international avenues including UNHCR and ICC-related mechanisms. My archive records international human-rights and protection pathways as part of the documentary history.

My position is that the evidence should be assessed against the applicable international protection criteria rather than dismissed because the alleged persecution occurs within the country of my citizenship.

UNHCR recognises that persecution can involve serious human-rights violations and that cumulative forms of harm can be relevant; it also recognises that persecution can arise from non-state actors where the state is unable or unwilling to provide protection. Whether those principles apply to my circumstances, however, requires an actual legal and factual assessment of the evidence.

The international criminal-law question

I have also framed aspects of my evidence for consideration under international criminal-law concepts, including crimes against humanity.

I do not claim that my archive itself establishes an ICC crime. The existence of an ICC submission, allegation or legal analysis is not equivalent to a judicial determination.

The relevant question is whether the documented conduct, if established, satisfies the applicable legal elements. Article 7 of the Rome Statute concerns crimes against humanity and requires assessment of the relevant conduct within the statutory framework, including the requirement concerning a widespread or systematic attack directed against a civilian population.

That is why I want the evidence examined at the level of individual documents, chronology, institutional decisions, causal relationships and legal elements rather than simply accepted or rejected as a narrative.

What I am asking for

I am not asking people to worship my conclusions.

I am not asking people to believe every allegation.

I am asking people to read the record.

If I am wrong, identify the document that proves I am wrong.

If my disclosures were properly dealt with, show how they were received, assessed and answered.

If legal assistance was properly refused or unavailable, show the reasons and the applicable review process.

If my account of institutional treatment is mistaken, identify the evidence establishing the contrary.

If the surveillance allegations are unsupported, investigate them and explain why.

If the financial-containment allegations are wrong, demonstrate the financial pathway that was actually available to me.

If I was genuinely free to leave my accommodation, identify the practical mechanism by which I could have done so.

If the treatment of Crystal was appropriate, document the decisions and reasons.

If my allegations of coordinated detriment are unsupported, identify the evidentiary breaks in the alleged pattern.

And if the record reveals matters requiring investigation, investigate them.

The central proposition

I am not asking for justice through belief in me.

I am asking for justice through examination of the evidence.

The archive exists because I have reached the point at which my own testimony alone is insufficient. I have therefore preserved documents, correspondence, government records, chronology, declarations, evidence pathways and analytical material so that other people can examine them.

The archive's own methodology requires a hierarchy: judicial or official determinations, primary government records, contemporaneous correspondence and logs, secondary compilations and AI synthesis, and finally author testimony and prophetic statements. It expressly instructs that allegations, inferences and interpretations must never silently become facts.

That principle is important to me.

I want my claims tested.

I want the documents tested.

I want the institutional responses tested.

I want the chronology tested.

I want the legal propositions tested.

And I want the same evidentiary standard applied to the institutions and professionals whose decisions have shaped my life as is applied to me.

If the record is wrong, show me where.

If the record is right, answer it.

Do not answer allegation with assertion.

Do not answer evidence with dismissal.

Do not substitute a diagnosis for an investigation.

Do not substitute institutional silence for an answer.

Do not substitute poverty for consent.

Do not substitute being technically free to leave for having a genuine means of escape.

Do not substitute the existence of a procedure for meaningful access to justice.

Read the record.

Examine the evidence.

Challenge it where it is wrong.

Corroborate it where it is right.

And where the evidence establishes something that requires investigation, investigate it.

The witness remains. The record remains. And the record remains open to correction — but correction itself must be evidenced.
