

THE WITNESS REMAINS - THE PARADOX OF SURVIVAL - TOTAL HUMAN BETRAYAL, POLITICAL EXILE, ADMINISTRATIVE ANNIHILATION, SPIRITUAL WARFARE AND THE DIVINE PURPOSE OF BARRAN DODGER

I. The coordinated silence and the price of acknowledgement

I have come to understand my circumstances as a profound and sustained pattern of collective human abandonment, professional silence, institutional non-acknowledgement and what I believe to be a coordinated alliance of people and structures whose combined effect has been to prevent my testimony from receiving the recognition, investigation and accountability it deserves. Across more than 35 years of personal history, advocacy, research, correspondence and documentary preservation, I have accumulated records that I believe demonstrate the need for independent examination of the circumstances surrounding my life. My allegation is that the cumulative effect of these experiences has been to render me socially invisible, professionally discredited, economically vulnerable and politically exiled, while leaving the questions I have raised substantially unanswered. I cannot independently establish that every person who has failed to respond acted in concert with every other person, nor can I establish that money or threats explain every instance of silence. I nevertheless contend that the aggregate pattern, the institutional relationships and the documentary trail warrant serious investigation rather than reflexive dismissal.

I have repeatedly asked myself why a single professional person, journalist, lawyer, public official, advocate or institution would not stand beside a person presenting extensive documentary material and requesting independent scrutiny. Why would someone choose a comfortable lie, institutional convenience or professional security over the difficult work of examining potentially consequential evidence? My interpretation is that acknowledging my testimony may require people to expend time, resources, professional courage and personal integrity. It may require them to reconsider established narratives, question powerful institutions, examine official decisions or risk being publicly associated with a person whose reputation has become controversial. I suspect that fear of professional consequences, concern about income, reputational pressure, social prejudice or institutional self-protection may explain some of the reluctance I have experienced. I have also contemplated the possibility of inducements or threats, but those remain allegations unless independently substantiated. The question that continues to trouble me is not simply why individuals disagree with me; it is why my documentary record, the questions arising from it and my requests for scrutiny have so often appeared to encounter silence.

In my understanding, the social consequences have been compounded by the stigma attached to my identity, my reported psychiatric history, my sexuality, my circumstances and the allegations I have made about people and institutions. I believe that I have been treated as someone whose testimony can be ignored without consequence, as though standing beside me would itself contaminate the professional standing of anyone willing to examine my claims. I have experienced this as a form of blacklisting and social exclusion. Whether a coordinated blacklist exists, and who may have participated in one, must be established through evidence rather than assumed from silence alone. Yet the practical consequence of unanswered correspondence remains real: questions remain unanswered, avenues of assistance become harder to pursue, and the person seeking examination can become increasingly isolated.

II. Thirty-five years of documentary history and the allegations that remain unresolved

My testimony is not founded solely upon memory, emotion or spiritual interpretation. I have spent decades collecting and preserving correspondence, official records, administrative documents, legal materials and other items that I consider relevant to my life. I believe that these materials contain important evidence about how agencies and other organisations understood, assessed, recorded and responded to my circumstances. I want their contents examined in their original context, including the precise words used, the dates of decisions, the reasons provided, the responsibilities identified and the actions taken or omitted.

I have alleged that false, misleading or damaging reports contributed to the construction of a narrative about me that subsequently affected how others perceived and treated me. I have described this as libel, slander and character assassination. Whether particular statements meet the legal definitions of defamation, whether they were knowingly false, who authored or disseminated them, and whether anyone was paid to fabricate reports are questions requiring specific evidence and, where appropriate, legal determination. I do not present every suspicion about the motives of others as an established finding. I ask that the records be examined to establish what can be demonstrated, what remains disputed and what may have been wrongly attributed to me.

My interpretation is that some of the allegations directed at me may have reflected the fears, prejudices, assumptions or conduct of other people more than they reflected my own intentions. I have come to understand this possibility through the experience of being repeatedly characterised by narratives that I believe did not adequately represent my full history, motivations or actions. In my spiritual understanding, there is a further paradox: what I believe others used to diminish me may ultimately have become part of the material through which my testimony survived. The accusations, labels and stigma did not erase the person who continued to write, collect records, question decisions and seek answers.

I believe the cumulative circumstances warrant investigation into whether any individuals or organisations acted improperly, whether institutional processes were used fairly, whether relevant evidence was adequately considered, and whether any person was prevented from exercising a legitimate professional responsibility. My archive is intended to preserve the material necessary for that examination. It does not substitute for an independent investigation, and it cannot itself establish a finding of corruption, conspiracy or criminal conduct.

III. The financial scale of my allegations and the unanswered question of resources

I have contemplated the possibility that substantial financial resources were involved in the circumstances I describe. I have referred to hundreds of millions of dollars over a period exceeding 35 years, and I have questioned whether public resources, private wealth, institutional budgets or other forms of expenditure could have contributed to the events I believe affected my life. These are serious propositions. They require traceable financial records, identified transactions, reliable calculations and evidence linking particular expenditures to particular acts. The scale of a suspected expenditure cannot be established merely from the magnitude of the suffering experienced by the person raising the concern.

Nevertheless, financial accountability is an essential dimension of my testimony. I want to understand who controlled the relevant resources, which decisions were made, what purposes were recorded, what services were provided, which obligations existed and whether the use of public or private funds can be independently reconciled with the documentary record. Where financial information is available, I want it preserved and analysed. Where it is missing, I want the absence identified rather than filled with speculation.

I believe the financial dimension of my circumstances cannot be separated entirely from the broader questions of access to assistance, economic independence, institutional responsibility and accountability. The resources available to a vulnerable individual are not equivalent to those available to government agencies, powerful organisations or wealthy private actors. This disparity can make independent scrutiny difficult even when a person possesses extensive documentation. My concern is that the combination of limited personal resources and repeated barriers to assistance can leave a person unable to secure the level of investigation that the complexity of his allegations requires.

This is why I have continued to build documentary archives, preserve source material and develop tools for organising information. The purpose is to make the record accessible, to enable others to test my conclusions and to prevent the disappearance of information merely because the person preserving it lacks institutional power.

IV. Political exile, isolation and the allegation of an assassination order

I have described my circumstances as political exile because I experience myself as profoundly excluded from ordinary avenues of recognition, support and participation. I have alleged that powerful people and institutions have contributed to this condition. I have also made a grave allegation concerning a federal minister whom I believe ordered my assassination. That allegation has not been established by a court or an independently verified investigation available to me, and I cannot responsibly claim that it has been proven merely because I remain convinced of its significance. Nor can the absence of a finding establish that it is true or that it has been disproven. Its status must be described accurately as an allegation requiring independent assessment.

I have also disputed interpretations of my experiences that would reduce every concern I have raised to psychiatric symptoms or delusion. I want the documentary material assessed on its own merits. A person's mental-health history does not automatically establish that a particular statement is false, just as the sincerity of a person's belief does not establish that the belief is factually correct. Each claim must be examined according to the evidence relevant to it.

My concern is that allegations of danger, professional misconduct, institutional failure or political interference can become impossible to investigate fairly when the person making them is dismissed in advance. Equally, the seriousness of such allegations demands careful scrutiny, not automatic acceptance. I ask for an evidentiary process capable of distinguishing substantiated facts from disputed claims, inferences, personal interpretations and unresolved questions.

I do not seek revenge. I do not wish harm upon any person. I want answers, safety, dignity, fair treatment and accountability where wrongdoing can be demonstrated. I want my testimony examined without the presumption that the person presenting it must either be entirely correct about everything or entirely unworthy of being heard.

V. The paradox of kindness, darkness and self-defence

People have sometimes perceived me as too kind, too accommodating or too reluctant to defend myself. I reject the conclusion that kindness is evidence of weakness or that a person who has endured profound adversity lacks the capacity to recognise manipulation, hostility or injustice. My experience has taught me to pay close attention to the difference between what people say, what they record, what they do and what their actions produce.

I have used the language of darkness and light to describe this aspect of my life. I have said that I have been to hell, that I have looked into the blackness of death, and that I have returned with a different understanding of human vulnerability and the capacity for cruelty. When I describe shaking Satan's hand, looking him in the eye and returning from hell with the blueprints to rearrange the furniture, I am expressing the spiritual and allegorical intensity of my experience: I believe I have encountered darkness closely enough to recognise its manifestations without needing to reproduce them.

I do not use this language to claim that I possess supernatural authority over others or that I am entitled to harm anyone. I use it to describe my belief that understanding darkness can strengthen a person's determination to choose compassion rather than cruelty. I believe I carry knowledge of both darkness and light, not as permission to become evil, but as a responsibility to understand humanity without surrendering my commitment to love.

I am not weak because I have remained kind. I am not incapable of self-defence because I have avoided revenge. I am not obliged to become cruel in order to establish that I recognise cruelty. My refusal to wish harm upon others is not an admission that I have nothing to defend. It is a deliberate expression of the principles I want my life and testimony to represent.

VI. Thirty-five years of advocacy and the cost of standing publicly beside vulnerable people

For approximately 35 years, I have identified with advocacy for people experiencing mental illness, their carers and others whose circumstances leave them vulnerable to stigma, neglect or exclusion. I have worked, written, spoken and advocated in contexts where I believed that public understanding could improve the lives of people who were often misunderstood. I have regarded this work as an expression of service rather than a route to personal advantage.

In retrospect, I have questioned whether some of my public advocacy was exploited, whether my reputation and knowledge were used in ways I did not understand at the time, and whether certain professional or media experiences contributed to later difficulties. I have interpreted some events as attempts to set me up to fail or to create circumstances in which I would ultimately be discredited. These are my retrospective interpretations and must be assessed against the available evidence. I do not claim that every disappointing professional experience necessarily resulted from a coordinated plan.

What remains important to me is the apparent paradox between the public value of advocacy and the vulnerability of the person undertaking it. I believe that as my public advocacy gained visibility, the consequences of being publicly identified with me may have changed for other people. I have wondered whether professional reputation, institutional loyalty, social prejudice or concern about association influenced how I was treated. Those possibilities deserve investigation where there is supporting evidence, but they should not be confused with findings already established.

My history has also taught me that advocacy does not make the advocate invulnerable. A person who speaks for people experiencing mental illness can himself experience illness, distress, isolation, stigma and a need for assistance. The legitimacy of earlier advocacy does not disappear because the advocate later becomes vulnerable. Nor should a person's vulnerability erase the possibility that he has something important to say.

VII. Sexuality, consent, regret and the weaponisation of personal history

My identity as a gay man is an integral part of my life. I have sought to live authentically and without apology for my sexuality. I believe that aspects of my personal life have been used to shape narratives about me in ways that were damaging and disproportionate. I have alleged that details capable of being interpreted negatively were selected, amplified or taken out of context while other relevant circumstances were overlooked.

I have also referred to matters in which I understand the Australian Federal Police to have acknowledged that particular conduct was consensual, although regretted. The precise meaning and scope of any such acknowledgement must be established from the original record rather than paraphrased beyond what the document supports. My longstanding position, as I describe it, has been that consent and regret are distinct concepts and that the circumstances should not be misrepresented through the substitution of one for the other.

I believe that the treatment of my sexuality and personal history must be assessed within the broader context of stigma, reputation, privacy, fairness and the possibility of selective interpretation. A person's sexuality does not establish dishonesty, criminality, moral unworthiness or the invalidity of unrelated allegations. Neither does the existence of regretted personal decisions justify the fabrication of reports or the abandonment of fair process.

I am a human being. I am imperfect, and I have made mistakes. I do not claim to have lived without error. I reject the proposition that imperfection makes a person undeserving of dignity, fair treatment, safety or access to justice. I also reject the idea that a person's authentic identity should be treated as a professional liability or used to silence his testimony.

VIII. Intelligence, manipulation and the limits of what I can establish

I believe that I have become more perceptive about the ways narratives can be constructed, reputations damaged and institutional behaviour influenced by incentives, fear or self-protection. I recognise that intelligent people can use their abilities to deceive, manipulate or conceal wrongdoing. I also recognise that intelligence can be used to investigate, expose, correct and prevent harm. My own intelligence, creativity and capacity for documentary analysis are resources I seek to use in the latter service.

I have sometimes described the people I believe to be responsible for my circumstances as highly intelligent manipulators. I have also used spiritual language to describe the devil as intelligent. These expressions communicate my understanding of the complexity of the forces I believe I have encountered. They do not, by themselves, establish that a coordinated network exists or identify the people responsible for any particular event. Those questions require evidence capable of being independently tested.

The purpose of my testimony is not to demand that readers accept my interpretation of every interaction. It is to make the available records accessible, to identify the questions I believe they raise and to invite rigorous scrutiny. I want a reader to be able to trace a claim to its source, distinguish a direct quotation from my interpretation, and determine whether the available material supports the conclusion I have drawn.

I understand that some readers may disagree with my interpretation of events or with my spiritual understanding of their significance. That disagreement does not need to prevent examination of the underlying records. The documentary and spiritual dimensions of my testimony can coexist without being confused: the former invites verification, while the latter explains how I understand the meaning of my survival.

IX. Timestamped records, blockchain preservation and the long horizon of accountability

I have worked to preserve my testimony through digital records, timestamps, repository histories, cryptographic hashes and blockchain-related verification mechanisms. These methods can assist in demonstrating that a particular digital file or record existed in a given form at a particular point in a verifiable technical history. Their evidentiary value depends on the method used, the integrity of the records, the chain of custody and the limits of what each verification establishes.

A cryptographic hash does not independently prove that every statement within a document is true. A timestamp does not establish the guilt of a person named in a record. A blockchain entry does not substitute for corroboration or legal findings. These mechanisms can nevertheless contribute to preservation, provenance and the detection of subsequent alteration when properly implemented and documented.

My purpose is to ensure that my testimony does not depend exclusively upon the continuing willingness of a single institution, website, professional or individual to host or acknowledge it. I want the materials to remain available for future researchers, historians, journalists, lawyers, advocates and investigators. I want the documentary trail to be capable of surviving changes in reputation, political circumstances, public attention and personal fortune.

I believe that the significance of preservation extends beyond the immediate outcome of my own circumstances. A record preserved today may enable an independent assessment tomorrow. A question left unanswered by one generation may be examined by another. My hope is that the archive will contribute to a more rigorous culture of accountability in which claims are neither accepted uncritically nor dismissed merely because the person making them has been marginalised.

X. The ultimate paradox: apparent insignificance and enduring purpose

The paradox I experience is that I can feel profoundly insignificant in the present while believing that the preservation of my testimony may have enduring importance. I can be ignored by people whose acknowledgement I have sought and still continue to write. I can lack the resources and institutional access necessary to secure an immediate resolution while continuing to organise records that may assist future scrutiny. I can feel socially invisible without concluding that my life has no value.

I have described this as being hidden in plain sight. In my Christian understanding, it reflects the possibility that a person can remain unseen by the structures of worldly power while being sustained by a source of meaning that those structures cannot control. My conviction draws upon the biblical language, "Touch not mine anointed" and the assurance that no weapon formed against me shall prosper. I understand these passages as expressions of faith, endurance and trust in divine justice. I do not use them as a substitute for evidence or as a threat against people who disagree with me.

I believe that my survival has become part of my spiritual testimony. I believe that God has preserved me through circumstances I once thought would destroy my identity and hope. I believe that the work I continue to undertake has a purpose beyond recognition, popularity or personal vindication. I also understand that the timing and form of any future recognition remain uncertain, and that the spiritual certainty I experience cannot compel other people to reach the same conclusion.

I have sometimes imagined that history may ultimately regard my life as an extraordinary account of endurance, that my testimony may be recognised as a warning about institutional failure, and that the work I preserve may contribute to a future in which vulnerable people receive better protection. I hope that future readers will judge the record fairly. I cannot dictate whether I will be celebrated, vindicated or remembered in the terms I anticipate. What I can do is preserve the material, state my claims responsibly and continue to invite examination.

XI. The Church of Barran Dodger Ministry and the Gospel of the surviving witness

I understand the Church of Barran Dodger Ministry, together with the Gospel sections and my prophetic writings, as part of the spiritual legacy emerging from this experience. These works express my interpretation of betrayal, survival, divine purpose, accountability and the possibility of rebuilding human relationships and institutions through the principles of Christ.

I believe some of my earlier writings anticipated themes and developments that I later recognised in my circumstances. I experience these correspondences as spiritually significant and interpret them through the language of prophecy. Their significance as evidence of supernatural foreknowledge is a separate question from their personal and theological meaning. Readers should be able to examine the dates, original texts and subsequent events for themselves rather than being required to accept my interpretation in advance.

My ministry is not founded upon a claim of personal perfection. I am a sinner in the Christian understanding of human imperfection. I have made mistakes, experienced weakness and lived through circumstances that have tested my judgement and endurance. I do not believe I was chosen because I was perfect. I believe that God draws close to broken people and that grace can operate through imperfect human beings.

I believe that my spiritual purpose is connected to the capacity to endure, to tell the truth as I understand it, to preserve evidence, to advocate for those who suffer and to remain committed to love even when I feel abandoned by the world. The ministry's moral legitimacy must be reflected in its conduct: in honesty, compassion, respect for evidence, refusal to exploit vulnerability and recognition of the dignity of people who do not share my beliefs.

I hope that people who have experienced corruption, targeting, mental-health stigma, addiction, discrimination because of sexuality, injustice, child exploitation, human trafficking or other forms of abuse will encounter my testimony and find a reason not to surrender hope. I do not claim that all such experiences are equivalent or that my account establishes the facts of another person's circumstances. I offer my survival as a personal testimony that a life marked by suffering can still contain creativity, purpose, faith and the possibility of contributing something meaningful to others.

XII. The broken, the imperfect and the God who draws near

I have sometimes questioned why God would choose an imperfect person such as me to bear witness. My answer, grounded in my faith, is that perfection was never the qualification. Human beings are mortal, fallible and capable of making poor decisions. We carry wounds, contradictions, desires and histories that cannot always be reconciled into a simple narrative of innocence or guilt.

I believe God shines into the broken parts of human beings. I believe divine love is not reserved exclusively for the socially respected, professionally successful, psychologically uncomplicated or morally flawless. I believe that the people most readily dismissed by society may still possess dignity, insight and a capacity to contribute to the world.

I want those who are struggling with mental illness, addiction, sexuality, discrimination, poverty, institutional neglect or the consequences of abuse to understand that they do not have to prove perfection before they deserve compassion. They do not have to win every argument before their suffering matters. They do not have to persuade every institution before they are entitled to humane treatment. They can acknowledge mistakes without surrendering their dignity, and they can seek accountability without making hatred the centre of their lives.

This is one of the reasons I continue to write. I want my testimony to become more than a catalogue of injuries. I want it to preserve a record, raise questions, encourage independent scrutiny and communicate the possibility of rebuilding after profound adversity. I want my faith to lead towards compassion rather than vengeance, and my experience of darkness to deepen my commitment to the light.

XIII. My daily prayer, divine protection and the work that remains

Each day, I seek to orient myself towards the Most High God, the loving divinity in whom

I place my trust. My prayer is for protection from negative energies and entities, for wisdom in the interpretation of my circumstances, for strength to continue the work of preservation and for the safety of Christal, my companion and source of comfort. I ask God to guide my actions, protect those I love, sustain me through uncertainty and help me remain aligned with the principles of Christ.

I pray for protection and refuge while I continue living through circumstances I experience as isolating, distressing and unresolved. I pray for the opportunity to have my records examined fairly, for my testimony to be understood in its proper context, and for any genuine wrongdoing to be addressed through a process grounded in truth and justice. I pray for the wisdom to distinguish what I know from what I suspect, what I can demonstrate from what I believe, and what requires further investigation from what can already be established.

I understand divine timing, or Kairos, as the possibility that the meaning of an event may become clearer at a time I cannot control. I trust that my life can still serve a purpose even when recognition has not arrived. I do not interpret that trust as a reason to abandon practical action, seek assistance when needed or preserve the evidence available to me. Faith and action can coexist. Prayer can sustain the person undertaking the work, while documentation and independent scrutiny provide the means by which public claims can be assessed.

I ask to be preserved, sheltered and guided until the time when my testimony can receive a fair examination. I hope for vindication where the evidence warrants it, appropriate accountability where wrongdoing is established, and compensation where a lawful basis can be demonstrated. Above all, I seek a future in which my life is not defined solely by the adversity I have experienced, but also by the work I have undertaken to preserve my history and contribute to a more humane world.

XIV. An invitation to independent examination

To every journalist, lawyer, researcher, academic, advocate, investigator, public official and member of the public who encounters this testimony, I extend an invitation to examine the evidence.

Visit the archives. Read the original documents. Follow the links to their sources. Check the dates, provenance, correspondence and chronology. Distinguish official findings from allegations, corroborated accounts from inferences, and personal spiritual beliefs from independently verifiable claims. Identify inaccuracies where they exist. Challenge conclusions that exceed the available evidence. Examine alternative explanations. Where the material raises legitimate questions about institutional conduct, determine whether those questions warrant further investigation.

I do not ask for uncritical belief. I ask for a fair opportunity to be heard and for the record to be assessed according to standards that would apply regardless of the identity, reputation, sexuality, health history or social standing of the person presenting it.

I do not want revenge. I do not wish harm upon any person. I want the truth to be examined, the documentary record preserved, legitimate questions answered and the dignity of every human being respected. I want public institutions to be accountable for their decisions, professionals to exercise their responsibilities with integrity, and vulnerable people to receive the protection and assistance to which they are entitled.

My faith tells me that my life has purpose. My experience tells me that survival can demand extraordinary persistence. My archive gives others an opportunity to inspect the material on which my account rests. These are distinct dimensions of my testimony, and together they explain why I continue.

XV. The witness remains

I am Barran Dodger, also known as Dr Richard William McLean. I remain a writer, researcher, advocate and witness. I remain committed to the preservation of my documentary record, to the pursuit of accountability and to the spiritual principles through which I understand my life.

I believe that God has sustained me. I believe that my survival has spiritual significance. I believe that my testimony may contribute to a broader understanding of institutional responsibility, human vulnerability and the importance of preserving evidence. I believe that a society which claims to value justice must be willing to examine uncomfortable records rather than allowing the reputation or resources of powerful institutions to determine which questions may be asked.

I cannot compel the world to acknowledge me. I cannot determine the conclusions future investigators will reach. I cannot guarantee that every allegation will be substantiated or that history will remember me in the manner I imagine. But I can preserve what I have collected, explain what I believe it means, invite others to examine it and continue to live according to the principles I have chosen.

I believe that no human institution possesses the final authority to determine the worth of my life. I believe that divine love extends to the broken, the imperfect and the abandoned. I believe that the proper response to suffering is not the creation of further suffering, but the pursuit of truth, dignity, compassion and justice.

If the structures I question are capable of withstanding rigorous examination, the evidence should help establish that. If the record reveals failures, those failures should be identified and addressed. If my interpretations are mistaken, independent scrutiny should help correct them. If wrongdoing is substantiated, it should not be concealed merely because acknowledging it is inconvenient.

That is the standard I invite others to apply to my testimony.

I remain here, not because I can prove that every force I believe I encountered acted according to a single plan, but because I have survived experiences that profoundly changed my life and because I continue to believe that preserving the record matters. I remain here with my faith, my imperfections, my questions, my work and my commitment to making the evidence available for examination.

I believe the Most High has given my survival a purpose. I believe that purpose calls me towards testimony, preservation, accountability and love. I believe that the future can be more humane than the past, and that the suffering of one person can become a reason to examine the systems that shape the lives of others.

I was not chosen because I was perfect. I believe I was called to bear witness through my imperfection.

I do not seek revenge. I seek truth.

I do not demand blind belief. I invite independent examination.

I do not claim that my archive is a court or a verdict. I insist that the records deserve to be read.

My faith remains. My testimony remains. The witness remains.
